Shell was one of the most favoured materials for ornaments in the Maya region. These discs probably once formed the central part of a pair of earflares; they would have been fixed with resin to wood mounts which were pinned through holes in the ear lobes. The imagery on each disc is in low relief and is accentuated by the use of red pigment on the ground and in the incisions. The discs are not flat, but retain the slight undulations of the natural shell. The backs are uncarved.

The disc on the right (809b) shows an elderly male carrying a zoomorphic staff in his right hand and an incense bag in his left. He has a long beaded necklace and a beaded belt and loincloth. An avian figure is shown at his back. His oddly-proportioned body has markings on the back, behind the knees and on the back of the upper arm. These markings are generally thought to be indicators of divine status (M. Coe, 1973:13; Scheie and Miller, 1986: 43). Nicolai Grube (personal communication, 1993) has identified these as 'tzuc' signs, indicating the four cardinal directions of the Mesoamerican world. Most probably he is God D, or Itzamna, one of the old Underworld gods, shown in his bird aspect.

The disc on the left is more eroded, but a seated figure with one leg drawn up can be discerned. He is sitting on an object in the shape of a profile head, leaning on his right hand. The left wrist is raised to the forehead, perhaps in a gesture of woe (Scheie and Miller, 1986: 215, 270, fig. vu.i). He wears a long necklace, a fringed hip-cloth and a bead belt. The body markings suggest that this figure is also a god. Avian forms are in front and behind the figure, and although erosion has obscured much of the detail, the bird behind the figure may be perched on a tree. In Maya iconography, trees are important elements in cosmological diagrams indicating divisions of space (Greene Robertson, 1983,1991a). Related pairs of engraved shell earflares are in the Denver Art Museum and the Peabody Museum of Archaeology and Ethnology, Harvard (Gallenkamp and Johnson, 1985: no. 21; Scheie and Miller, 1986: pl. 83).
