Michael Tyzack was a leading figure in the development of British abstraction in the 1960s. His paintings from this period use colour and geometric forms to generate dynamic optical effects. The abstract wave forms in this painting create a sense of multi-directional movement which is deliberately disrupted on the central horizontal axis. Tyzack's dynamic handling of flat colour appealed to the American art critic Clement Greenberg, who awarded him the John Moore's painting prize in 1965 for Alesso 'B', a painting that makes a comparable use of abstract wave patterns.
